Introduction

[Paste the introduction of your article here. This paragraph style is justified, set in Georgia 11.5pt with 1.5 line spacing in the spirit of OpenEdition Journals' printed layout — replace this placeholder text with your own. Do not add a first-line indent to the opening paragraph of a section.]

[Subsequent paragraphs use a first-line indent and no extra space-before, matching the continuous flow typical of OpenEdition journal articles. Simply copy and paste your manuscript text into these paragraphs, or overwrite this placeholder directly. A footnote call can be inserted like this one.]

1. [First Section Heading]

[Body text for the first main section. Use Heading 1 for top-level sections (numbered, e.g. “1.”, “2.”) and Heading 2 for subsections (e.g. “1.1”). Long quotations of more than three lines should be set off as block quotations — see the “Block Quotation” style below.]

1.1 [Subsection Heading]

[Subsection body text. Keep heading capitalisation in sentence case for a refined, editorial look. Citations in the text should follow your chosen referencing style consistently throughout, e.g. (Glissant 1990, 14) or via footnotes, as required by NaKaN's style sheet.]

[This is the block-quotation style: indented from both margins, set in a slightly smaller serif size with no first-line indent, and marked with a coloured rule on the left. Use it for quotations exceeding roughly three lines.]

2. [Second Section Heading]

[Continue the article structure as needed: add as many Heading 1 / Heading 2 sections as your article requires.]

[Here is a sentence demonstrating a footnote call<sup>1</sup>. Footnotes appear at the bottom of the page in smaller type, matching standard scholarly conventions used across OpenEdition-hosted journals.]

Conclusion

---

[Close your article with a concluding section that restates your argument and situates your contribution within the broader field. Replace all placeholder text throughout this document with your own content before exporting to PDF.]
